GRANTS AND RESEARCH EXPERIENCEResearch Interest and Approach

As an applied medical anthropologist, I bring cross-cultural perspectives to the study of chronic disease, Hispanic/Latino Health, and cancer. I have extensive experience in qualitative, ethnographic, and mixed methods research. My program of research has consistently focused on understanding the influence of socio-cultural factors on health and to develop and identify the best models and methods for adapting instrumentation and proven interventions across the cancer continuum among Hispanics/Latinos and all populations using community engaged approaches.

Impact of goal attainment scaling on engagement and outcomes for patients with chronic low back pain receiving physical therapy: A pragmatic clinical trial

Our long-term goal is to further develop and improve measurement of treatment success, effectiveness of conservative interventions, and patient-centered care and engagement for patients with cLBP. This application will specifically focus on the use of a novel application of GAS by physical therapists as a treatment enhancer for patients with cLBP. Our central hypothesis is that patient outcomes can be improved by involving the patient in decisions about their own care, including the process of developing, identifying, and assessing goals as described during GAS. The primary objective of this proposed research is to examine the impact of GAS on treatment outcomes for patients with cLBP receiving PT. A secondary objective is to compare the engagement of patients with cLBP who participate in GAS versus those who receive guideline-based (GB) care. Women at work: Cancer survivorship and employment among diverse women

To examine work-related experiences and quality of life following the diagnosis and treatment of cancer among Latina, African American, & European American women who were employed at the time of diagnosis. The project builds on the tenets of community-based participatory research and stems from a strong partnership between research team members and two community-based organizations.

Florida prevention research center

The Florida Prevention Research Center (FPRC) uses community-based prevention marketing (CBPM) to strengthen health department and community capacity for cancer prevention. Over the next five years we will test pharmacy-led patient education and test kit delivery in community health centers serving low-income patients. This use of screening tests according to Community Preventive Services guidelines will lead to reductions in colon cancer in Florida overall, and particularly among the medically underserved.
